More Debate on Energy Corporation May 30, 2008

The House of Assembly will continue debate Monday on proposed changes to the Energy Corporation Act. Members sat until just after 10 last evening in discussions on the openness and accountability of the amendments. The Opposition has been hammering away at the government with concerns over the ability of the auditor general to report potential criminal activity to police, provincial liability and what it calls the secrecy that will shroud the energy corporation. Justice Minister Jerome Kennedy says in the competitive environment of big energy business, we have to be willing to protect commercially sensitive information. Opposition Leader Yvonne Jones says the removal of oversight provisions and the broad definitions in the proposed changes leaves too much up to interpretation. Jones says even if this government has the best of intentions, they leave the door wide open for future governments. NDP Leader Lorraine Michael says allowing subsidiaries that have yet to be set up to be exempt from certain oversights causes her concern.
